M3 Ch11 Beyond the Book: Essential Information Security for Corporate Employees

The “Essential Information Security For Corporate Employees” report talks about how people play a big role in information security issues. It states that almost two-thirds of security breaches happen because of human mistakes. Really, it's like leaving a door open for bad things to happen. Keeping information safe is important for any business to do well. Everyone needs to know and follow the company's rules about security. If not, the business could be in danger.

The report says that some situations make the risk of a security breach even worse. For example, if a company is competing a lot, or if they've fired someone who's angry, or if some people don't really know about security. To make things better, the author suggests that each person in the company should be careful and do their part to prevent security problems. This means being careful about how you share information and following good practices, especially when it comes to things like social engineering.

A big part of the report talks about social engineering, which is when bad people trick you into sharing secret information. The report tells us to be careful about this and to always check who's asking for information. It's like making sure someone is really who they say they are before you tell them something important. The report also tells us to be smart about sharing stuff online and keeping passwords safe. It's about being careful with information and making sure only the right people can get to it. Overall, the report says that everyone needs to pay attention to security and be a part of protecting the company's information.
